METHOD

- Through group work and individual data collection you will learn how to develop research questions and conceive research designs on the topic of work precarity.

- You will be involved into the first steps of research on social inequality.

- To do so, you will be trained in qualitative research methodology in order to conduct personal interviews with young people working in two of Berlin’s most precarious labour fields: gastronomy and the gig economy.

APPLICATION

The course is open to Bachelor students from Social Sciences, Ethnology, Geography and Cultural Studies, as well as other disciplines from Social Sciences and Humanities.

SCOPE OF THE SEMINAR

Precarity has become a significant global phenomenon, also in Europe, where ever more people face lives in insecurity, move in and out jobs and have difficulties in planning in the long term.

Especially, young people are affected: they are mostly working in atypical and insecure employment and the lack of opportunities and the uncertainties in everyday life make it increasingly difficult for them to meet the expectations of an independent adult life.

Scope of the seminar is to investigate how young people in Berlin cope with precarity. Therefore, you will explore how precarity in work affects young people’s daily life beyond: in their housing situation and their social life.

Interested candidates are requested to send a short note by 15th of April to: precariousurbanyouth@gmail.com
